Now your cell phone can nag you about your eating habits.

Sprint has launched a service that lets subscribers with camera phones take pictures of their meals and send them to nutrition experts who will tell them how well they're eating.

The service is being offered through a Canadian company called MyFoodPhone, whose staff of nutritionists will evaluate subscribers' meals and send video clips with advice and health tips every other week. The service costs about $10 per month.

Users will also be able to see their food photos on a Web-based journal, where they can log information like weight and exercise habits.

Reston-based Sprint (NYSE: S), like its rivals, continues to add data services and other applications to its wireless plans. Its recent additions have included a Global Positioning System locator service, another that lets parents track their kids and a music download service.
